

A Mental Health Foundation national inquiry
Dementia – what is truth?

Exploring the real experience of people living with more severe dementia

Toby Williamson
Head of Development & Later Life

Mental Health Foundation

- UK charity
- Mental health problems, learning disabilities, dementia, public mental health – all ages
- Social research, service development, influencing, information and guidance

Different realities – different truths?

- Believing that a deceased parent is alive and wanting to visit them
- Gaining comfort by holding a doll, believing it to be a real baby
- Not recognising a spouse or partner, or being convinced that a spouse or partner is an imposter or deceiving them
- Wishing to leave a care home and “go home” when the care home is where they now permanently live
- Seeking activities/roles that replicate jobs or activities the person did prior to developing dementia

Dementia – “delusions” or different realities?

mental health foundation

Some emerging themes and findings

- There is no single or right answer
- Context is crucial
- It's not simply a question of lying or telling the truth
- Professionals and family/friends – different perspectives
- Can the Mental Capacity Act help?
- Learning from elsewhere e.g. Hearing Voices Network

We want to hear your views

<https://www.surveymonkey.com/s/DementiaInquiry>

<http://www.mentalhealth.org.uk/our-work/research/dementia-truth-telling/>

Talk to the person you are sat next to. Can you describe a situation where you or someone you know who lives with dementia is experiencing a different reality.

1. What did it mean to the person living with dementia?

2. What was the most helpful response?

- Telling the truth
- Reframing/redescribing the experience
- Distracting the person
- Avoiding discussing the experience
- Going along with the experience
- Lying about/reinforcing the experience
- It wasn't clear
- Something else